European Migration and Refugee Crisis

2015 was marked by the largest mass migration since World War II, with more than 1 million migrants and refugees reaching Europe. The humanitarian emergency is not likely to be solved in 2016 and generates different responses across countries. The current migration crisis is splitting European societies and threatening the European model. The causes and consequences are not yet well understood. Among the multiple challenges, the following stand out: Who are the refugees and what are their motives? What determines their preference for a certain country or region? What explains the attitudes of natives towards refugees? Which role is played by the rise in demand for ethnic homogeneity and national identities? Which are the roles of the media and public communications in today's democracies? What are the political strategies that could successfully deal with the situation? Approaching the migration and refugee crisis as a complex political and social phenomenon, this special issue is considering articles dealing with some of the above or other relevant issues. Themes for consideration could include (but are not limited to) the following:

- National and European refugee policies
- Refugee and asylum seekers rights and protection
- Borders, security and migration
- Digital connectivity and migration
- Public discourse and attitudes towards refugees and immigrants
- Migration crisis and mass media
- Identity and cultural aspects of immigration and integration
- Economic aspects of migration and labour market integration
- Education and health of refugees and immigrants
- The impact of migration on sending and receiving local economies and countries

The deadline for article submission is October 15, 2016. Submit as soon as possible for the fast editorial considerations. Publication of the Issue is scheduled for the 2016 volume.
